ALE

Ale is typically fermented at warm temperatures, above 15°C (60°F). At these temperatures, the yeast can produce significant amounts of esters and other secondary flavor and aroma products, and the result is often a beer with slightly "fruity" compounds resembling but not limited to apple, pear, pineapple, banana, plum, cherry, or prune. Most ales contain hops, which help preserve the beer and impart a bitter herbal flavor that balances the sweetness of the malt.

AMBER ALE

"Amber ale" is a term used for pale ales brewed with a proportion of crystal malt to produce an amber-colored beer generally ranging from light copper to light brown. A small amount of crystal or other colored malt is added to the basic pale ale base to produce a slightly darker color, as in some Irish and British pale ales.

BARLEYWINE

Barley wine, or barleywine, is a beer style of strong ale originating in England around 1870. A barley wine typically reaches an alcohol strength of 8% to 12% by volume, but may be brewed to much higher strength. It is called a barley wine because it can be as strong as wine, but since it is made from grain rather than fruit, it is, in fact, a beer.

BELGIAN ABBEY-STYLE ALES

Beer has been made in Belgium since at least the Middle Ages. It is believed today that beer was brewed at some monasteries during this period; however, no written proof exists. The Trappist monasteries that now brew beer in Belgium were occupied in the late 18th century primarily by monks fleeing the French Revolution. Today, these old-world Belgian/French-style ales are still brewed in Belgium and by breweries around the world in the fashion of the traditional Belgian monasteries.

BROWN ALE

Brown ale is a style of beer with a dark amber or brown color. The term was first used by London brewers in the late 17th century to describe their products, such as mild ale, though the term had a rather different meaning than it does today. Today, there are brown ales made in several regions, most notably England, Belgium and North America. Beers termed "brown ale" include sweet, low-alcohol beers, medium-strength amber beers of moderate bitterness and malty but hoppy beers.

HEFEWEIZEN

A south German style of wheat beer, weissbiers are made with a typically high ratio of wheat. Specific yeasts are used that produce unique phenolic flavors of banana and cloves with an often dry and tart edge, some spiciness, bubblegum, or notes of apples. They typically have little hop bitterness and a moderate level of alcohol. The "Hefe" prefix means "with yeast," hence the beer's unfiltered and cloudy appearance.

IPA

India Pale Ale or IPA is a style of beer within the broader category of pale ale. It was first brewed in England in the 19th century. The first known use of the expression "India pale ale" comes from an advertisement in the Liverpool Mercury newspaper published January 1835. Before January 1835, and for some time after, this style of beer was referred to as "pale ale as prepared for India." IPAs typically are flavored with large amounts of hops, which imparts a high level of bitterness to the ale.

PALE ALE

Pale ale is a beer which uses a warm fermentation and predominantly pale malt. It is one of the world's major beer styles. The higher proportion of pale malts results in a lighter color. The term "pale ale" was being applied around 1703 for beers made from malts dried with coke, which resulted in a lighter color than other beers popular at that time. Different brewing practices and hop levels have resulted in a range of taste and strength within the pale ale family.

PORTER

Porter is a dark-colored style of beer. The history and development of stout and porter are intertwined. The name was first used in the 18th century from its popularity with the street and river porters of London. It is generally brewed with dark malts. Today, many breweries brew porters in wide varieties, including, but not limited to, pumpkin, honey, vanilla, chocolate, and bourbon.

SEASONAL

The advent of autumn and the holidays that follow bring a flood of seasonal beers to market, from pumpkin spice ales to Oktoberfest and yuletide brews. This, of course, follows a long, hot season of wheat, blueberry and other summer beers. Christmas beer is a tradition that actually predates Christmas. It goes back to the earliest days of brewing.

STOUT

Stout is a dark beer made using roasted malt or barley, hops, water, and yeast. Stouts were traditionally the generic term for the strongest or stoutest porters, typically 7% or 8%, produced by a brewery. Imperial stout, also known as "Russian imperial stout" or "imperial Russian stout," is a strong dark beer or stout in the style that was brewed in the 18th century by Thrale's brewery in London, England, for export to the court of Catherine II of Russia.

WITBIER

Witbier, white beer or simply witte is a barley/wheat, top-fermented beer brewed mainly in Belgium and the Netherlands. It gets its name due to suspended yeast and wheat proteins, which cause the beer to look hazy, or white, when cold. It is a descendant from those medieval beers that were not brewed with hops, but instead flavored and preserved with a blend of spices and other plants referred to as "gruit." It still uses gruit, although modern gruit consists mainly of coriander, orange, bitter orange, and hops.

LAGER

Lager is a type of beer made from malted barley that is brewed and stored at low temperatures. There are many types of lager; pale lager is the most widely consumed and commercially available style of beer in the world; Pilsner, Bock, Dortmunder Export, and Märzen are all styles of lager. There are also dark lagers, such as Dunkel and Schwarzbier.

AMBER LAGER

Amber lagers first originated in Europe. Like their ale counterparts, amber lagers are brewed with a small amount of crystal malt to produce an amber-colored lager during the brewing process. Amber lagers range in styles from pale European lagers to the celebrated Oktoberfest-style German marzen.

AMERICAN-STYLE LAGER

American is pale lager that is typically made and consumed in North America. As a general trend outside of Bavaria and the Czech Republic, where the beers may be firmly hopped, American-style lagers developed as a modestly hopped beer and sometimes contained adjuncts such as rice or maize.

BOCK

"Bock" is the term for a strong lager of German origin. Several substyles are based on bock, including maibock or helles bock, a paler, more hopped version generally made for consumption at spring festivals; doppelbock, a stronger and maltier version; and eisbock, a much stronger version made by partially freezing the beer and removing the ice that forms.

EUROPEAN-STYLE LAGER

Many European-style lagers adhere to century-old brewing laws that strictly govern all aspects of the brewing process. Bavarian brewers in the 16th century were required by law to brew beer only during the cooler months of the year. In order to have beer available during the hot summer months, beers would be stored in caves and stone cellars, often under blocks of ice.

PILSNER

Pilsner (also pilsener or simply pils) is a type of European pale lager brewed with a specific type of yeast. It takes its name from the city of Pilsen (Plzeň), Bohemia, in today's Czech Republic, where it has been developed since 1842, when a bottom-fermented beer was first produced. The original Pilsner Urquell beer is produced there today.
